Several studies report that high fat diets promote the development of obesity in animals and humans. Evidence suggests that alterations in diet-induced weight gain may depend, at least in part, on the increased cortical reactivity to food stimuli. In this study, the authors investigated whether a high fat diet induced changes in cortical plasticity and food intake in rats. Rats were kept on either a high fat or a low fat diet (LD) for 5 weeks from weaning. The last 2 weeks of dietary treatment were divided into 2 sub-periods, and the rats were tested for cortical plasticity: plasticity of cortical evoked potentials (EP) was tested using long (500 ms) stimulation train and memory was assessed in the episodic-like (match-to-sample) task. The high fat diet induced body weight gain, and food intake was increased in the sub-periods of the high fat diet compared with the low fat diet, however food intake did not differ between the sub-periods. The high fat diet did not alter the cortical plasticity, or the working memory performance. The results indicate that high fat diet did not influence cortical plasticity or food intake.Q: What is the state and trajectory of the spacecraft after the end of the film "Looper"? In the movie "Looper" (released in 2012), a criminal organization/guild called the "Looper" employs the use of a time traveling agent. The agent is hired to kill specific people to prevent them from revealing secrets or accomplishing an outcome that would threaten the organization. It is a common occurrence that a person is not killed at the desired time and place. In these cases, the agent comes back in time and kills the target.
